  • Newcomer engagement in planning decision-making processes
• Findings and Discussion
• Recommendations
Introduction to Research Program

• Intersection of immigrant integration and participation in planning
• Planning for versus planning with newcomers
• Capturing a diversity of interests in public decision-making to identify ‘common good’

• Research objectives:
  1. How does engaging newcomers in planning processes facilitate integration?
  2. How can inclusive decision-making lead to better planning outcomes?
Immigration in Canada

- Two-thirds of newcomer population live in Toronto, Vancouver, or Montreal, despite representing one-third of national population
Municipal Responsiveness to Immigration

• Immigrant settlement policy acknowledging municipal role
• Support for community organizations and community needs
• Mechanisms to increase newcomer political inclusiveness
Literature Review (Municipal Responsiveness)

• Most outstanding studies:
  • Good (2009): Role of civil society organizations and coalescing of migrant communities
  • Tossutti (2012): Relationships between local governments and civil society organizations and communal or local identity
  • Fourot (2015): Mechanism determining how policy trajectories change over time

Preliminary Analysis

• Conclusions of other studies:
  1. City of Toronto: “Very responsive”
  2. City of Brampton: “Unresponsive”

• Factors assessed in preliminary study:
  1. Acknowledging community identities
  2. Partnering with civil society organizations
  3. Engaging newcomers in civic affairs
1. Acknowledging Community Identities

• Refers both to immigrant and municipal community identities

• Immigrant groups that are not able to organize as communities are limited in pressure they can exert on municipalities

  • Brampton: 2040 Vision, encourages inclusion of “cultural groups and foster individual group profile, expression, celebration, and identity”; commits to establishing Institute for Brampton Cultural Diversity
2. Partnering with Civil Society Organizations

• Strength of relationships between municipal governments and civil society organizations, as well between such entities
  • Toronto: Emerged in lead up to amalgamation in late-1990s
• Civil society organizations’ unique position to facilitate connections between host and newcomer populations and cultivate greater sense of acceptance
  • Canada: Local Immigration Partnerships, which develop plans to build inclusive and responsive environments for newcomers
3. Engaging Newcomers in Civic Affairs

• Creating occasions in which newcomers’ valued opinions can influence public decision-making processes

  • Brampton: 2040 Vision, entailed comprehensive public engagement for its preparation and committed considerable resources to future consultations
Preliminary Findings

• Study of plans, policies, and other official documents:
  1. City of Toronto: Continues to lead charge
  2. City of Brampton: Has made up significant ground

• Employ symbolic and practical acknowledgement of multiculturalism
• Create community development plans through open consultation and carry out collective action
• Infusing public engagement exercises with features that acknowledge diversity
Study Overview

• Are municipalities ‘walking the talk’ when engaging immigrants in public decision-making?

• Case studies:
  1. City of Toronto: Jane-Finch Initiative
  2. City of Brampton: Official Plan Update

• Methods: Semi-structured interviews with planning practitioners
What is Public Engagement?

• Public engagement can take many forms
  • Focus of study: Municipally driven public consultations on planning-related matters
• Types of considerations:
  • Accessibility: Timing, location, food, and support services
  • Language: Translation and interpretation
  • Education: Capacity-building leading up to decision-making
Paradigm of Immigration Engagement

Planning with Newcomers

Effectiveness of Engagement Methods

Representation of Immigrant Populations
Literature Review (Migrant Engagement)

• Utilize creative participation techniques to engage not one, but multiple ‘publics’ (Nguyen et al., 2015)
  • Expectations must be managed on scope, outcomes, and impacts of processes

• Planners are uniquely positioned to facilitate marginalized groups’ taking their rightful seat at table in decision-making (Rios, 2015)
  • Developing and demonstrating cultural competence
  • Leveraging unspoken ‘cultural contracts’

Findings

- Despite pandemic, planners have pursued surprisingly innovative approaches to engaging newcomers in public participation activities.
- Importance of engaging civil society organizations more closely.
- Practitioners have shown some degree of exercising cultural competence to inform how exercises are promoted and facilitated.

• Planners confront barriers inhibiting more meaningful engagement that can truly result in ‘public’ decision-making and build trust
  • October 2021 report: 34 per cent of contributions during 2018 municipal election came from development industry
• Doubts persist relating to perpetuating tokenistic participation and not accommodating cultural norms into public consultation
Recommendations

• Involve civil society organizations in citizen capacity-building on how to contribute meaningfully to municipal decision-making processes

• Increase resources to facilitate access to public engagement, with focus on cultural sensitivity and emerging technologies

• Draw upon cultural and local ties to develop collective identities

• Reimagine role of planning practitioners to advocate for needs of newcomer communities
Next Steps

• Scoping review on both planning for and planning with newcomers
• Interviews with:
  • Local planning officials
  • Representatives of civil society organizations
  • Immigrant participants in public participation exercises
• On-site participant observations of planning-related public engagement activities
